, there is a plaque upon a small island off Jaffa. There are two documents in London (one in the British Museum and one at the Imperial War Museum) which record the dates of the sinking of the HMT Empire Cromartys at Jaffa, on July 11, 1942. They are the only known wreck of the Sydney and are in water that is only four to five meters deep. "It's a unique wreck, the first recorded Australian naval shipwreck at Jaffa", says the ship's ballast report at the Lisson Gallery in London. Indeed, the Empire Cromartys was a Victorian Warship, built in 1864, and just like the Royal Australian Navy's other ship, HMAS Sydney, was burned to the waterline during the Battle of the Java Sea, while under the command of Captain Charles Duncan. The ballast report from the Museum of Sydney says the wreck of the Empire Cromartys lies only 1.2km off Jaffa's coast, a short distance from the Kishon River. It is a "flat sandy bottom with a mangrove zone along the river". Captain Charles Duncan took the name of the vessel from the actual point from which the HMS Bangor, the ship that the British Empire finally conquered the Australian colonies. The Empire Cromartys left England on April 7, 1942, and arrived in Sydney on May 29, 1942. The Empire Cromartys was in Sydney for about two months and then set sail for Jaffa on July 11, 1942. The EMPIRE Cromartys was hit by three German dive bombers and sank at around 10.00am. It was carrying machinery and explosives, which exploded. In 1972, I was in Greece. The country then, and still does, has a population of immigrant heritage. So, it is no surprise that, on the memorial day of the volunteers who died in the battle for Greece in 1941, there was a parade of the hundreds of thousands of men and women who have served in various branches of the Greek military in the last 70 years. In three days, I watched and listened to men and women in the army, navy and air force, in tanks, in armoured personnel carriers, in helicopters, in frogmen, in commandos, in coast guard vessels, in diving and surface vessels, in paratroopers... all at the age of 75, 80, 90 and beyond. They were the survivors of the Dardanell

Q: Redis: how to store a string containing line breaks for memory optimization? I have several collections of values, each a list of strings, separated by a single newline character. I'd like to store them all as a single value in the cache, but I need to make sure that, in the case where the individual strings are larger than, for instance, 512B, only the first 512B are kept, and the rest is discarded to make the string shorter. How do I do this without sacrificing the ability to look them up by the individual strings later on? A: You could use Lua to put the lines into chunks. Lua objects have a built in "splice" method which allows you to replace parts of a lua object. local keys = redis.call('KEYS','my_cache:lob:my_procedure') local values = redis.call('HGETALL','my_cache:lob:my_procedure') local lua_table = {} for i = 1, #keys do local key = keys[i] lua_table[key] = {} for j = 1, #values do local line = values[j] if #line
